We've launched a programme in partnership with Windsor Fellowship to help Black, Asian and minority ethnicity (BAME) graduates kickstart their careers.

The National Lottery Heritage Fund and the Windsor Fellowship have created this paid graduate traineeship programme to play our part in increasing diversity within the heritage sector, better reflecting and representing the diversity of the British public.

"In these difficult times I'm delighted that we are working with the Windsor Fellowship to offer these new opportunities for graduates as part of our efforts to increase the diversity of the sector."

Why we're helping BAME graduates

We are committed to ensuring we are inclusive within all areas of The Fund, from projects to employees. We recently pledged to do more to drive greater equality, diversity and inclusion in heritage, initiating a diversity review and taskforce to accomplish this.

Chief Executive, Ros Kerslake was pleased to see the action following the launch of the review: "In these difficult times I'm delighted that we are working with the Windsor Fellowship to offer these new opportunities for graduates as part of our efforts to increase the diversity of the sector."

BAME communities are widely under-represented within the heritage sector; both as visitors to heritage and within the workplace. A 2017 report revealed that engagement with heritage was proportionately higher from white people than the BAME groups across all types of heritage sites, with the exception of sporting heritage. In one of our recent Future Heritage blogs, Dr Anjana Khatwa shared evidence that the environmental sector (natural heritage) is the whitest in the UK, with just 0.6% of the workforce identifying as non-white.

This opportunity aims to provide BAME graduates with invaluable work experience to kickstart their future careers in the sector. The Fund will support the graduates through a 12 month period, offering mentoring, guidance and real work experience, which will increase their employability.
